How do research practices that assemble and study vernacular cultural practices enable us to conceptualize the links between sexuality, region and politics? How are sexual expressions in the public domain shaped by the charged networks in particular locations? What methodological moves are necessary to study political figures and struggles using sites and events that do not occupy center-stage in global and national narratives? The speaker will draw on her research on the politics of sexuality in Kerala to examine how and why an engagement with cultural practices generate a disaggregated mapping of the political.
